No, Sydney water already charge more than enough for a product they basically get for free, true, there are costs in supply and treatment, but i believe they are easily covered by current charges. There seems to be waste and incompetence at all levels with this organisation. And what other products does one still have to pay for when it cant be supplied, because of a lack of planning and investment to future proof the supply, storage and distribution network. Hundreds of thousands of new houses, apartments businesses, being or have been built, with no apparent increase in either storage or distribution. Enough is enough, fix the bureaucracy and the system, then maybe an increase when the general public can see value for money
