Submission: I do understand a decent intention of this scheme. By the way, it has lost its way when implemented. First of all, every consumer pays out the increasing cost of canned or bottled products by 20-30%. They are meant to get those money back by the scheme. The scheme fails to give back those over and over. The reason is there is not enough machine/refund centers. Two over-counter refund operators, near my place, have stopped the campaign after a while and the nearest center is 20 minute walk. There is no guarantee that they are still operating. I do understand why the operators gave it up. it costed them their staffs, time and storage. The closet machine is 40 minute drive. Also, no guarantee the machine will be full or operational. It could end up I have to spend more on petrol and time. Donation is not an option for me because I feel like I am forced to pay for the products in the first place. If it keeps going this way, inadequate number of machines and inaccessible locations, it is not fair for everyone who has to forcibly pay extra and never get those money back.
