

Author name: K. Oppliger

Date of submission: Thursday, 26 April 2018

Submission: "The bottom line for any consideration is environmental. The environmental crisis is akin to but greater than a global war crisis. We must be set on a comparable "war footing" with a war economy to combat climate change. Moves that short sightedly only consider mere economics and seek to protect businesses miss the point. Any reduction in feed in tariffs that makes solar energy less attractive contributes to the environmental crisis.

Added to this is the injustice that sees the solar homeowner doing the heavy lifting while power companies sell their "green" power for premium prices.

The problem is the fact that the tribunal is working to allow companies to flourish. Perhaps privatised companies are the problem. Utilities run by the state for the people which can be harnessed to combat the environmental crisis, and financed through the total resources of the state is what is needed."