Submission: One of the silliest waste of money experiments ever. For many years we have been trained to wash our bottles and bin them in "re-cycle". Most thinking people are doing this and will continue to do so - a windfall for the waste people. Those that simply throw away their bottle will still do this. Threepence deposit on bottles way back in the early 1960's was not enough to convince people to return bottles. My soft drink manufacturer father who washed and recycled bottle went broke because people could not be bothered returning bottles for a mere threepence. These days kids don't roam the streets - their parents drive them everywhere. 10 cents per bottle or 100 for $10 is hardly worth the effort of collecting, transporting to, and then feeding them into a cantankerous machine. Obviously some people will collect them so we get the comment in our local press about some people raking through recycle bins on the footpath and making a mess (pollution!) to extract carefully recycled bottles (for free) so that they can sell them (?) So in the end it becomes a pocket money exercise for scavengers bankrolled by benighted consumers at huge overall expense. Gone will be the days where decent community minded citizens would go out and pick up the waste of the thoughtless litterers. But the scavengers will only collect bottles. The solution of course is for the place that sells the bottles to take them back for full refund. Coles and Woolworths might volunteer as much as pigs might fly.
