

Author name: Anonymous

Date of submission: Tuesday, 2 February 2016

Submission: I do not understand the rationale behind the increase in pensioner public transport costs. I would have thought to get pensioners away from using cars would be a priority. In Europe there are reductions on all public transport long and short trips for anyone over 60 years. Public transport can be the lifeline for some pensions at present and many get together only because they can afford the $2.50 day trips. Why isolate the elderly?

I do not have a car now; I do not clog up the roads being a sole driver. It is not as if public transport is becoming more efficient - rather the contrary - to justify such an increase.

This is just so unfair